 "NN 0905 7693.Chapel (remains of)." (1) "Kilmallie church seems to have stood originally on hill above the town of Kilmallie. James Gordon(1641-54), writing from Pont's notes stated that the church was then (Pont, 1583-1601) within the town, and the church now stands at Corpach, to the E. ward of Kilmallie. The second church is traditionally believed to have been built by Gillie dow-mak-chravolich, on whom sir Walter Scott based the character of Brian in 'The Lady of the Lake'. The building of the next church of Kilmallie is attributed to the Cameron chief, Ailean nan Creach who built it in the early 16thc, although it is more likely to have been built by his son, as part of a penance. The stones from the ruin of this church are believed to have been incorporated into the graveyard wall of the present church(built. 1783). There is no reason to believe that the enclosure within the graveyard is the remains of Alan's church. It was the ancient burial place of the Lochiel family. The church is said to have been dedicated to the Vigin Mary over.....

It may be significant that the annual fair, held here on August 18th, was called Mary Fair."(2)(3)(4)(5)(7)A small portion of the side wall, fast mouldering away, situated in the graveyard of Kilmallie Church is all that remains of one of the seven chapels founded by a chief of Locheil about the year 1450. The dedicatory name is not known."(OSFI:DT:16.9.1970) "No trace of any of the old churches."(OSFI:NKB:15.5.1970) "NN 0911 7693 Roofed building, church."(5)"NN 0905 7693 Sub-circular enclosure.(Graveyard)"(5) "NN 0905 7699 Sub-rectangular enclosure.(Graveyard)."(5) "Chruch, Graveyard, Chapel(remains of)."(6) "See continuation card (1) for map (6)."
